WHEN flat furs such as Persian lamb, krimmer, mink and so on are used as trimmings on the new Fall coats, they are apt to take the form either of sleeves of exaggerated size or of capelets of one type or another. Now that capelets are detachable and may be fastened in back or may be worn long or short, the fashion designers have taken a new interest in them. The long-haired furs are best in high round collars that stand well up around the face.

NuBack*
TRADE MARK PATENTED

NuBack* creations are fashioned for women who demand intelligent corseting.

They will not ride up...can NOT RIDE UP.

Whatever the occasion may be—sports, sitting at bridge or the theatre, general or evening wear—you are correctly corseted in a "NuBack*".

These garments are as flexible as nature would have them. They give that sculptured loveliness essential in the modern mode, and lend that charm attained through perfect comfort.

The secret is in the clever design of the back section. When you stoop or sit, it extends (shown by the dotted line in the illustration). When you stand up, it instantly and unnoticeably contracts, with the same natural action as the muscles.

These wonder garments are made of fine fabric which will not stretch out of shape. If you would know that perfect realization in modern corsetry ask your corsetiere or favorite corset department for NuBack* corsets or foundations.

They are very moderately priced

FOOTNOTES ON A WEEK'S HEADLINERS

[From The New York Times.]

ANOTHER REPORTER

It appears to be a habit of English-speaking people to designate a formal report by the name of its signer or chief investigator rather than by the subject examined. Thus, the British have had their Simon and Montagu reports on India and their May report on government finances; during the war the Bryce report on atrocities stirred up easy credulity.

In the United States two momentous documents known better by surname than content might be mentioned: the Wick-ersham report of a few years ago and the recent Seabury report. Last week the custom extended into the League of Nations when the findings were made known of a commission of investigators which examined the explosive difficulties between China and Japan; already this prodigious inspection has lost the label of its subject and is known as the Lytton report, after Lord Lytton, chairman of the League commission.

It is a question whether the report confers immortality upon Lord Lytton or whether it is the other way around. It does, however, bring into the headlines a famous Victorian name which used to have prolific appearances on the title pages of books. There is disagreement with the conclusions of the Lytton report, but not even the unkindest Japanese critic would be so unchivalrous as to point out that they are sponsored by a man who is dexterous in skiing down steep slopes and in skating over ice which may be thin, who is son of a poet who published under another name and the grandson of one of Britain's greatest romantic novelists.

Victor Alexander George Robert Lytton, the second earl of that name, had for a grandparent Edward Bulwer Lytton, who made a dead city live again under the title "The Last Days of Pompeii." Another of his shelfful of books was "The Last of the Barons," a somewhat ungenerous label, inasmuch as Edward Bulwer adopted his mother's name and was created the first Lord Lytton. Further promotion in the peerage came to the second generation with Bulwer Lytton's son becoming the family's first earl.

The first earl was both Viceroy of India and Owen Meredith, a poet, and it was in the viceregal lodge at Simla that the present Lord Lytton, investigator of one of the most explosive of Oriental problems, was born fifty-six years ago. His education was Eton, Cambridge and Continental travel. His inheritance was Knebworth, one of Britain's most magnificent estates, which was long on art treasures but short of revenue and had been saved for the Lytton family many times since the days of William the Conqueror by richly dowered marriages. His endowment was the features of a young Greek god and a somewhat romantic temperament. Instead of the wealthy marriage expected of him he chose the daughter of a small official in India.

There is no evidence that Lord Lytton has regretted it. Knebworth was rented when its revenues fell off after the war, its art collection was sold in America; now that there are no tenants it has been closed. Lord Lytton has carved out his own career. In 1916 he entered the Cabinet as Civil Lord of the Admiralty. Two years later he was a British Commissioner in France, and a year later returned to the Admiralty. In 1921 he was sent to India as Governor of teeming Bengal, and a few months later the guns at Delhi roared out a salute to him as Viceroy of all India, the place his father held before him. It was an interim appointment, and since then Lord Lytton has been at Geneva as India's representative at the League of Nations.

"BACCHANTIAN MAIDEN."

LAST week, after eight or ten years of shooting at the Eighteenth Amendment, one of the so-called "women wets" set up a new target, giving the dries an unusual opportunity of having something to attack instead of defend. Mrs. John S. Sheppard, State chairman of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform, offered a plan for New York State liquor control if and when the Eighteenth Amendment is repealed.

Condensed into as many sentences as it has columns, Mrs. Sheppard's plan calls for the creation of a State Liquor Commission with three members appointed by the Governor and four from such organizations as the Bar Association, Medical Association, Chamber of Commerce and the Board of Regents. The commission would buy, manufacture, import and sell liquor. Retailing would be in the hands of private concerns supervised by the commission; liquor could not be sold for profit, but soft drinks might be, and each place where alcoholic drinks were retailed would have "a meeting place for recreation."

Mrs. Sheppard is the wife of a New York lawyer. From Lenten sewing classes and similar well-disposed social gatherings she graduated to settlement work, and, she says, "it was my experience here which made a vehement anti-prohibitionist out of me." Actually, there is nothing vehement about her. She is tall, slim, with white-haired distinction.

There is something about her which seems to infuriate the D. Leigh Colvins who have frequently debated prohibition with her. Last Spring, a few days after a platform duel with Mrs. Colvin of the W. C. T. U., Mrs. Sheppard crossed microphones with Dr. Colvin of the National Prohibition Committee. Dr. Colvin became so provoked that he burst forth with a few hot words about "Bacchantian maidens parching for wine—who, like the drunkards whom their program will produce, would take pennies off the eyes of the dead for the sake of legalizing booze." The answer of the "Bacchantian maidens" was to publish Mrs. Sheppard's photograph.

A COMMUTING ENVOY.

COMMUTING between New York, Washington, Geneva, London, Paris and Berlin these days is another American banker and special envoy. Norman H. Davis attended as United States delegate last week the resumption of the disarmament conferences at Geneva and then left for conversations in London and Paris.

Mr. Davis.

Like Mr. Robinson, Mr. Davis was with the Supreme Economic Council in Paris. Like Mr. Robinson, he has served under Presidents Wilson and Hoover. In the Wilson Administration he was an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and then Under-Secretary of State. Like President Hoover, he is a Stanford graduate; he left the California institution five years after Herbert Hoover received his degree.

He is 54 years old, with the soft accents of his native Tennessee still upon his tongue. His grandfather was a Confederate soldier. One brother is president of one of the South's largest banks, another brother is a Congressman from Tennessee. Mr. Davis began his business career in Cuba. At 28 he organized the Trust Company of Havana. He remained in Cuba until the United States entered the war; then he went to Washington and offered his services. Another Tennessean, William Gibbs McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, took him over to the Treasury Department, where he became a financial adviser to Mr. McAdoo upon foreign loans.

After the war he became a trustee of the Bank of New York and Trust Company. He has a Summer home in the Massachusetts Berkshire country and he fishes for salmon in New Brunswick.

* * *

"ROBINSON, DO SO."

LAST week President Hoover raised the curtain an inch or two and gave the hearers of his Des Moines speech a glimpse of what went on behind the scenes at headquarters "in the war on the economic front." He did not name those who shared with him the anxieties at headquarters, but no list would omit mention of Henry M. Robinson of Los Angeles, intimate friend and unofficial adviser.

Mr. Robinson is now chairman of the permanent central committee created by the President's business conference to coordinate government and business efforts toward recovery. In a sense he is with the government, yet not of it. With some justification he might be termed Mr. Hoover's Colonel House and a Hoover Frank Stearns. He is as frequent a White House guest as was President Coolidge's Mr. Stearns—he remained at 1,600 Pennsylvania Avenue all

Mr. Robinson.

Summer. Like Colonel House, he performs confidential, delicate missions for the President. He is as devoid of self-seeking as both the Wilson and Coolidge friends, but he has not Colonel House's air of mystery or Mr. Stearns's rapt fascination with the great white light which beats upon the home of the Presidents.

Mr. Robinson is a lawyer who practiced for ten years in his native Ohio before moving to California, where he took up banking and now heads one of the largest chains of banks in the West. He is head of a shipbuilding company and director of insurance and public utility companies. President Wilson drafted him during the war for the Council of National Defense, took him to Paris with him for the peace conference, called upon him to investigate coal and labor problems and then placed him on the United States Shipping Board.

The Shipping Board was the nearest Mr. Robinson ever permitted himself to approach being a regular government official. Presidents Wilson, Coolidge and Hoover invited him to enter their Cabinets, but he refused. With Owen D. Young and General Dawes he played an unobtrusive hand in the negotiations which resulted in the Dawes Plan.

This long-distance commuter between Washington and Los Angeles is tall, sturdy, pleasant, imperturbable, deliberate of speech. Keen blue eyes peer through steel-rimmed spectacles. His hair appears prematurely white, for he is a living denial of his 64 years.
